

Report: Most Educators are Aware of OER, Don't Understand OER Licensing

Posted on 11/06/2017

A new report examines who the decision-makers are in curriculum adoptions and finds that a sizable percentage of schools have chosen open educational resources in the last three years.

Most school districts, 77 percent, have made at least one full-course curriculum adoption decision in the last three years, according to a new report from the Babson Survey Research Group. Teachers are most likely to have a role in those decisions, according to the results, with 93 percent of respondents saying they are decision makers and another 6 percent saying they have a role in offering advice.

District-level administrators, by contrast, came in second, with 75 percent of respondents naming them decision makers and 19 percent saying they have a role in offering advice regarding full-course curriculum decisions. Principals rounded out the top three, named decision makers by 73 percent of respondents and advisers by 18 percent. .To access the full report, visit onlinelearningsurvey.com/ .

Source: THE Journal

OTAN offers "Open Education Resources and Adult Education", a face-to-face workshop that provides information about OERs and how they are licensed. For more information on how to schedule this free workshop for your California adult education agency, please call (916) 228-2580 or email support@otan.us .